

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits:
How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

Full Episode Transcript

With Your Host

Kara Loewentheil

UnF*ck Your Brain with Kara Loewentheil

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

Welcome back to our Greatest Hits series where I occasionally like to reintroduce you to one of the greatest hits of the podcast. Truth is, after doing this for so many years and having hundreds and hundreds of episodes, there are a lot of great episodes that newer listeners haven't heard at all or that long time listeners could stand to go back and revisit.

Each of these podcasts are some of my favorite, most impactful, most insightful podcasts, and they are definitely ones that keep giving you new things to learn and think about the more often you listen to them. So even if you've heard this episode before, I really encourage you to listen again. You will pick up new things. Your brain will synthesize it differently. And if you haven't heard this episode yet, then you are in for a treat.

Welcome to *Unf*ck Your Brain*. I'm your host, Kara Loewentheil, Master Certified Coach and founder of The School of New Feminist Thought. I'm here to help you turn down your anxiety, turn up your confidence, and create a life on your own terms. One that you're truly excited to live. Let's go.

Hello my chickens. How are you? This is a momentous podcast because it is the first podcast recorded in my new home that I've moved into. And I am sure that Pavel, my podcast producer is already upset because it's not as well insulated. But we're going to live with it, if it's a little echoey just bear with me. We'll get this sorted out. I'll coat myself in tapestries or something. So, I moved to Brooklyn which as a nearly lifelong Manhattanite I did not ever think I would do. Even more unlikely I moved here for a boy, I mean for a man, for my partner who lives nearby.

And I'm telling you that because it's actually relevant to today's podcast because I want to talk to you about when your feelings are not a kind of good guide. And how to know when something being really difficult is actually worth it and good for you. And this concept and topic kind of came to me as I was thinking about what I've learned so far in this relationship and what the experience has been like.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

So, I have been in this relationship for about a year now. And I have, dear lord, learned a lot about myself even at my ripe old age having been in many relationships before. It's been a real year. First of all, I learned I would move to Brooklyn, which I definitely didn't think was the case. I live in a house now that has stairs, that feels extremely suburban. I have a backyard. I feel like I've moved to the country. But this relationship has been an enormous growth and learning opportunity for me, a lot of which felt fucking terrible because sometimes growth is not that fun.

So that's why I want to talk to you about it today. So, I was thinking about this because there have been a lot of big identity shifts for me in growing into this relationship and this new phase in my life. And that is why I'm talking about this because I think it's so relevant to all of you whether your kind of context is going to be a relationship or something else in your life. And no matter what happens with this relationship those lessons and that journey is going to be something that I always have with me, which is one of the nice things about growth.

So, I want to talk about this today because my experience of the kind of first year of this relationship was so different from what the stereotypes are and what internet psychology tells us things should be about. I mean I guess I'm internet psychology also but pop psychology like social media psychology. And so, I really want to talk about that because again your thing might not be your romantic life, it could be your professional life, it could be some kind of physical goal you have. It could be your family, whatever it is.

There is all of this social stereotyping for instance that the beginning of relationships are when it's easy. That you have a honeymoon phase when you meet, you fall in love, it's so easy, it feels amazing in the beginning. Our social narrative about relationships is that they're fun and easy in the beginning and then they get hard and boring. And that's such a bullshit narrative. First of all, that comes from having an unmanaged mind. Your relationship is going to feel the way your thoughts about your relationship feel.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

So, if you have shitty thoughts about your relationship then you're going to feel terrible. And if you have positive thoughts about your relationship you're going to feel good no matter how long you've been together. But the story that there's this honeymoon phase, it feel amazing and then it gets boring and hard. What we're really saying is sometimes it's that people are infatuated when they first meet, they have positive thoughts more easily. And then they're not managing their mind to create their emotions that they want as the relationship goes on.

But I also think that we have sort of digested and spit that back out in a weird way in a lot of the sort of social psychology I see going on which is all of these sharable quotes that are those little quote squares that are like trust your feelings. And if something feels hard it's not meant for you. And if you're with the right person it will feel easy. And love means never having to apologize. And love means never having to explain yourself. Love means someone meeting and exceeding, and anticipating your needs.

And if it's struggle or it's hard, or if you don't feel good then that means the person is bad or wrong for you, or they're toxic, or it's not the right fit or whatever. And all of that is just bullshit. I mean if you fell in love and it just was perfectly easy then kudos to you, that was not my experience. And maybe this just isn't an area you struggle or maybe you were just high on the validation and finally kind of achieving the goal you thought you wanted. But emotional growth often does not feel good. And that's why most people don't do it.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

There is this great Emily McDowell quote and image goes around about self-development that basically says, “If we told people that self-development felt like dying, they wouldn’t do it. That’s why we call it self-development instead.” That’s what it feels like sometimes. So, the idea that if something feels hard, or if it’s challenging to communicate, or if you are ‘triggered’ that automatically means that something’s not right for you, or that something has gone wrong. It’s just not true. And that’s not true whether it’s a job, or a partner, or anything else.

Because that would mean either that emotional growth always feels super fun and pleasurable, which we know is not the case. Or it would mean you have zero emotional growth to do. Something feeling perfectly easy and pleasant all the time basically means you’re not growing, you’re just trying to create an echo chamber where somebody never triggers anything unresolved in you. And that’s not really true intimacy. Or it’s not looking at yourself with a real eye and being honest about what’s going on with you. That’s not being really vulnerable and coming up against yourself.

And I’ve been thinking about this so much in the context of my relationship because now a year into it this is about when I’m starting to feel the honeymoon phase kick in. It has taken me about a year to actually work through all the shit that came up for me in the first part of this relationship. And I am sure it’s not over. There will be more later on but I have gotten through the first round of it. And it’s taken until now to really feel a lot more of my daily experience of it be all those positive emotions that we hear about and that we think romantic relationships are supposed to bring us.

Of course, they’re created by our own thoughts. It’s never by the other person. But it’s only now that I’m even really starting to be able to relax and think enjoyable thoughts about it because I have a fucking human brain. And especially if you have attachment issues intimacy is challenging. And again, it’s my relationship but for you it could be starting a business or trying to go back to school, or trying to get into a new career, or whatever. The idea that if it's meant for you it will feel easy. And if it feels like a struggle it's just not the right fit is just so misguided.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

If you have self-esteem issues then a promotion can feel really hard and challenging, or a new job could feel really hard and challenging. Trying to start and build a business can feel really hard and challenging.

If you don't think you're good enough, if you have imposter syndrome and you don't think you're good enough for your role and then you get a promotion that is not going to actually feel good. It's going to feel really hard and challenging after the initial high wears off because your self-concept is in conflict with what you're trying to do now and that will make your brain hurt. That will bring up all your shit. If you have attachment issues, intimacy can be hard, whether that's a new friend, or a romantic relationship, or whatever.

If you experienced complicated family dynamics growing up, intimacy can be hard. If you've had a lot of negative thoughts about yourself in your romantic life you may have worked on them enough to get into a different kind of relationship and be able to actually receive the kind of partner you want. But then there's a whole new level of cognitive dissonance and stuff that gets stirred up once you're in the relationship that you have to work on. So, whatever the area where it's so much less important it can be in a lot of different areas of our lives.

But understanding that the idea that whatever's for you will feel easy and anything that feels hard is just not right for you or it's just not meant for you is so inaccurate and incorrect. And it makes me very mad because I'm not [inaudible]. So, if you are not interested in emotional growth and development then sure, follow whatever feels easy.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

But if you are and you just kick anything out of your life that doesn't feel easy right away, or you kick anyone out of your life. Where you have some trouble communicating, or where negative emotions come up, or where intimacy is making you uncomfortable. You are missing out on so many opportunities to get to know yourself, and learn about yourself, and love yourself at a deeper level.

So, all of that being said of course this idea that's sort of things that are challenging are good for us can be taken too far. Because the way I just said it, things that are challenging are good for us is not necessarily true. It is not true that anything that's hard is good for us. It is just also not true that anything that's easy is good for us. So, it's not that anything that's hard is good for us. It's that some things that could be good for us are also hard. So, it's not that anything that's hard is valuable. It's that some things that are valuable are also challenging.

There can be a tendency I think to sort of fetishize difficulty, to think that the hardest things are the most worthwhile. And it's not that simple either. If you're in an abusive relationship, doing thought work to be okay with that would be very difficult and challenging. That's very hard thought work. That's probably not worthwhile thought work. That's not a useful way to use thought work. So, it's not that whatever is the most challenging is the most worthwhile.

And I think this is why people want it to be one way or the other. They want it to be if it's for you it's easy or they want it to be the hardest things are the most valuable because we just want a simple rule. When really what you have to learn is how to discern when something is hard because you are growing, or evolving, or healing, or confronting something.

Or when something is hard because there isn't really any redemptive purpose or value to it, it's just you making your life harder by trying to thought work your way to put up with something that you don't really want to experience or do. And that's all subjective. That's what's so complicated about being honest about the kind of discernment and sophistication that's required to do this work at this level. I can't give you a blood test to know if what you are doing is a valuable challenge or not a valuable challenge.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

The only thing you can do is ask yourself, why do you want to do the work and stay with the difficulty? What value are you connecting to for you? Why is it worth or not worth going through the discomfort of whatever the job, or the person, or the situation, or the relationship is bringing up for you? And you have to check in with your big picture vision for your life. We can try to stick with things that are really hard and painful for us where we aren't really growing or learning because we're actually staying with them out of insecurity, or scarcity, or ego.

If you are in a job that you don't enjoy, doing work you don't care about with a boss who screams at you all the time, and you're working on widgets and you don't care about widgets. It's not that there might not be some value in learning to be happy even though those things are happening. That could be valuable. But you've just got to check, why is that what you want to do?

If your reasoning is that you believe that you're not smart enough to get any other job, that reason doesn't feel good. And so, the work is not going to feel good. You're always going to be fighting against the sort of foundational reason you're doing it. When we try to use thought work to get us through or change a reaction to something challenging, it will feel good and worthwhile when our reason is aligned with our values and things we care about. It will not feel good when the whole reason we're doing it is out of scarcity.

So, for instance in my relationship even though it was bringing up a lot of stuff for me to work on, I knew that this was work I wanted to do for reasons that I liked. If my reason had been, I don't think that anyone else will ever love me. I'm not good enough. Nobody will want to be with me. I've got to make this work. That reason would not feel good. It would not motivate actual growth. And it would not be aligned with my values and so I would just be suffering without really having a value driven reason to do that work.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

Whereas in my situation I wanted to stay and do this work because I could tell that what was coming up was something unseen and unhealed in me, thought patterns that I hadn't been aware of before, ways that my nervous system had gotten patterns that I hadn't really had to confront before. And I knew that even though the day-to-day I was having a lot of negative emotion.

When I looked at the values I had for a relationship, my partner and I kind of met those values. We shared important life values. We wanted the same kind of relationship. We had a lot of compatibility. There are things about our connection, our relationship that worked well together. I enjoy him. I respect him as a person. We had a lot of elements of things I wanted. So, I knew that this was a relationship that I wanted to be in. It was not out of scarcity or insecurity.

And that I was sort of discovering and learning new things about myself, a lot of that felt terrible because until I figured it out I mostly was discovering and learning how easily triggered I was into negative emotions around certain things. So that was not my favorite part. But I knew that that work was work I wanted to do and I liked my reason for wanting to do it. But I had to use that intellectual understanding to really carry me through the parts that felt so emotionally hard.

And I think that sometimes in this sort of swing – it's not that emotions aren't valid. They're neither valid nor invalid. They're just sensations in your body caused by your thoughts. So, I don't think it's even useful to ask if they're valid or not but I think that there is this kind of sometimes kind of swing away that's reaction against just being too brain focused, which I totally understand, when I discovered thought work like many analytical people I did not want to feel my emotions. And I just wanted to use thought work to get out of feeling negative emotion and that's not useful.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

So, there is totally a way in which you can overintellectualize and ignore your feelings in a way that isn't helpful. But that doesn't mean that all your feelings are always right. Sometimes I think it just gets misunderstood. When someone says, "Your feelings are all trying to tell you something," that's true. They are information about what's going on with you. But they're not always telling you the truth. They're not always an objective sort of reflection of reality or of what's going on.

And so, your feelings are a clue that you're having a thought you want to look at. And there's nothing wrong with a negative emotion. But we can also kind of over-fetishize our emotions. And I think that's kind of the point of this episode for me is that neither your emotions are always the answer nor your thoughts are always the answer. Neither is it true that anything difficult is worth it, nor is it true that everything valuable is easy. You have to develop the discernment to know and the self-trust to know when is this difficulty worth it.

And I have given you some questions I think are useful for you to think about like why am I going through this difficulty? What is challenging me? Am I being challenged in a way that is illuminating something new to me about myself that I didn't realize or understand? Or maybe I've been aware of but have never really worked on, that I've always run away from before. Why am I doing this? What is my end goal? How does that align with my values? Is it coming from insecurity, or ego, or scarcity, or is it coming from a desire that feels aligned with the person I want to be and what my values are?

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

These are all useful questions to ask yourself but it is never as sort of black and white as this should feel easy or it shouldn't feel hard, or everything should be hard. It's neither one of those things. And when I was working through this in my relationship I really needed to have access to that kind of value based thinking from my prefrontal cortex, the part of me that can do higher order thinking. And I needed that to get through the part that was so emotionally challenging otherwise it would have just seemed like, this is hard and I feel terrible and why would I put myself through this.

So, it's just so important to understand that if you tell yourself, I just want something that feels easy you're not asking yourself the right question and you're glossing over or combining two very different things. One of which is does this feel hard in a way that is worthwhile, that is important, it's connected to what I value, it's in pursuit of a bigger goal I'm trying to achieve? Then it may be a thing that is very right and good for you. I mean again this is all made up thoughts, we don't get a test on what's good for you. We don't get a certificate from the universe.

But within your own framework and the way you're trying to live your life, it may be a place there's growth for you and positive results if you keep with it and you're willing to put that work in and feel uncomfortable. That's very different from this sucks and I'm only sticking with it because I don't think I deserve any better. I don't think I can succeed on my own, I don't think I'm good enough, whatever version of that you might be thinking. Those are two very different reasons.

Not everything that feels hard is inherently a valuable growth experience. But not everything that is sort of good for you or aligns with your highest desires and goals, or will produce, growth and change is easy. You can't always do the easy or always do the hard. You really have to learn and practice the discernment of asking yourself, why is this hard, and is it worth it.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

So, if it's hard because I'm trying to coach myself to feel okay about somebody calling me names and cancelling with me all the time because I don't think I can find another partner. That's probably nothing redemptive coming out of that.

On the other hand, if something's hard because I have some unhealed patterns, or unhealed trauma, or thought patterns I haven't looked at that's coming up, or I'm learning something about myself I didn't really know. Or I'm just having a lot of emotions come up, I don't even know why yet. But I'm doing this because I see this positive end goal that my kind of higher thinking self has then that's a very different story. It's different to say, I don't think anyone else would want to date me and I want a relationship where I'm truly intimate and vulnerable. And so, I want to build this connection.

Or it's very different to say, I want to stay in my job because I don't think I can get another one so I've just got to make peace with this versus I really think it's worthwhile to me to do the work to know I can feel proud of myself in any circumstance. And then I'll decide later if I want to stay in this job.

So, all of that are questions that I recommend you ask yourself. But above all, do not drink the Kool-Aid that what is for you will always feel easy and that if something feels hard you should just walk away. Because those are not the correct questions to ask yourself, they don't dig deep enough into what kind of challenge you're experiencing and why. And those are two ways to never grow as a person for the rest of your life. And that's not what we do around here, is it? That's not why we're here.

Alright my chickens, that's it. Go forth. Develop your discernment. Ask yourself these questions. I'll talk to you next week.

If you're loving what you're learning on the podcast, you have got to come check out The Feminist Self-Help Society. It's our newly revamped community and classroom where you get individual help to better apply these concepts to your life along with a library of next level blow your mind coaching tools and concepts that I just can't fit in a podcast episode. It's also where you can hang out, get coached and nerd out about all things thought work and feminist mindset with other podcast listeners just like you and me.

UFYB 350: Greatest Hits: How to Know When Emotional Difficulty Is Worth it

It's my favorite place on Earth and it will change your life, I guarantee it. Come join us at www.unfuckyourbrain.com/society. I can't wait to see you there.